Medieval Writing Systems (From the History of Georgian language)

- Christianization and the process of emancipation of vernacular languages;
- “Eastern vernacular languages which did not belong to the politically, culturally or religiously accepted or privileged languages, became literary languages” (W. Boeder).
- Inculturation and important social functions of vernacular languages

Medieval Writing Systems (From the History of Georgian language)

“If an ordinary linguist compares the history of the Georgian and Oriental languages with that of Western European languages, he will definitely be surprised at the significant difference visible in the development of these languages. [...] Historical, linguistic, and social problems need explanation. How did it happen, that Georgian was established not only as a language spreading Christianity but has firmly maintained its place up to our time? Why did Greek fail to dominate here as an ecclesiastic, liturgical, scientific, as well as literary and official language, which could be expected as an analogy of Latin in medieval western Europe?” (W. Boeder).
